MSCA domain	Social Sciences and Humanities (SOC)
Research focus area	Intergroup relations; Prejudice and dehumanization; Social perceptions of digital technologies
Department	Department of Educational Science
Short description of the department/laboratory/ research group	The laboratory of Social & Language Psychology (SLP) is located in the Department of Educational Science and is headed by Luca Andrighetto and Luca Onnis. It is an interdisciplinary lab that combines approaches and perspectives from social psychology and cognitive science. The lab's work is centered around the following research lines: nonverbal behaviors in intergroup interactions, cognitive and motivational processes underlying the perception of human vs. non-human agents, how children and adults learn one or more languages, and how multiple languages dynamically coexist in social networks. To address these issues, a wide array of methods are employed, including chronometric studies, computer simulations, gaze and eye tracking or online surveys.

Short description of the department/laboratory/research group	Tarello Institute for Legal Philosophy (TiLPh) is one of the world's leading centres for legal research and education. Our work is focused on topics in analytical legal theory and philosophy of positive law, constitutional democracy, theory of legislation, human rights, sociology of law and history of legal culture. TiLPh members run four peer-reviewed journals and a few book series. Moreover, TiLPh currently offers various master programmes and a PhD programme in Philosophy of Law and History of Legal Culture. We also welcome applications to make research visits from scholars of excellence at all stages of the profession, especially those with active interests in topics of our expertise. Proposed visits may be for anything from a few days to a full academic year. We can usually provide visitors with office accommodation at the Institute, where we have a library with an outstanding collection of works in legal philosophy. Most of it is in English, Spanish and Italian, though we also have numerous publications in French and German.

Short description of the department/laboratory/ research group	My present research aims at mapping the places and the chronotopes of the so-called Israelkorpus, a (mostly) German-language collection of interviews with German speaking Jews, who emigrated from Central Europe to Palestine/Israel mainly between 1933 and 1939. The mapping will show the relationship between memory, places, and the related linguistic coding within both memory and the narrative process of the interview, which is therefore also linked to the emotional dimension.

Department	Department of Antiquities, History, Philosophy, Geography
Short description of the department/laboratory/ research group	The Department of Classics (DAFIST) at the University of Genova offers a unique environment to carry out an interdisciplinary research focused on ancient texts and their reception up until contemporary age: the Department has a long-standing tradition of research in textual criticism, as proved by its scholarly series devoted to editions and commentaries of texts, as well as to reception studies; thanks to the integration between the individual research units, the faculty of classics work in close interaction with colleagues in modern literatures, languages and fine arts; such interdisciplinary approach is reflected in our libraries, in which classical literatures are integrated by history, philosophy, linguistics and fine arts. Both the Department and the School of Humanities provide a well-coordinated administrative network, where different offices work together to support researchers during all phases of a project.
